

For the Right to Learn

Malala is different from any other woman her age. In 2012, at the age of 15, she was shot in the head because she spoke up for girls in Pakistan and their right to go to school. Luckily, she didn't lose her life and got well. Malala became a voice for girls' education and then, in 2014, she also became the youngest winner of the Nobel Peace Prize. After facing problems with getting her own education, she finally finished high school in the UK in 2017. The first time she used Twitter, she wrote: "I'm excited about my future, but I know that millions of girls around the world are out of school and many never get the opportunity to complete their education." What's next for Malala? She is in the UK for her studies at Oxford. She said, "I want to get my education — a good university education. My dream is to empower myself with education, and then it is a weapon." Malala is working to make her dream come true.
